It's lovely to see the children all back in school after the half term break. I had a great time in Nigeria, although a real culture shock. Whilst there I visited a couple of primary schools. It was incredible to see the contrasts with life here in the UK and it made me realise just how lucky we are here. I showed the children some photos of my trip on Monday in assembly and they were really interested.

Thank you to everyone who came to the Pancake Flip and came to share their child's work. Lots of comments were made about the work in books. Parents, teachers and external visitors all comment on the great things going on in with the children's learning and the progress they are making, particularly with their writing.

Next week we have more visitors in school on Monday and Tuesday and then Thursday it will be World Book Day. You are invited to come for an assembly at 9am on Thursday to look at everyone's costumes and some of the adults will be reading an extract from their favourite book. I am looking forward to receiving my costume – I just hope it fits! At this assembly we will also be launching the new reading initiative.

Have a lovely weekend and I look forward to seeing you all in school on Monday.
